Cerebral metabolic imaging with positron emission tomography was used to detect abnormalities in brain metabolism in dystonia, a functional brain disorder. The study included 10 patients with idiopathic dystonia and 10 normal subjects. We analyzed the brain metabolism using the PET technique. We observed low 18F-fluorodeoxyglucose (FDG) cerebral metabolic rate in the putamen and globus pallidus of the patients with idiopathic dystonia. We also observed a low glucose metabolic rate in the left precentral gyrus, and the left medial and lateral temporal gyri in patients with dystonia. A high regional cerebral blood flow (rCBF) was observed in the brainstem of patients with dystonia. An abnormal lipid metabolism was not observed in patients with dystonia. We suggested that abnormal brain metabolism in the basal ganglia might be involved in the pathophysiology of idiopathic dystonia, and that brainstem hypoperfusion might be involved in brain dysfunction in dystonia. Universal Application of Stereodynamics as a New Tool in the Study of Blood-Coagulation. The use of the stereodynamic technique, already successfully applied for polysaccharides and biomacromolecules, in the study of blood coagulation is reported. Blood coagulation is an important process in the blood, where, depending on the health status, at any time it is caused by any factor capable of destroying the vessel wall and so causing local hemorrhage. The cause of this pathological processes is a difficult to analyze, and it has a great number of components. The stereodynamic analysis of the blood coagulation activation causes an increased local (second) order concentration, so revealing a more speedy reaction. The kinetic study shows an initial rise of the concentration followed by a stagnation, which disappears when the process is almost completed. The blood coagulation activation takes from seconds to minutes, depending on the component analyzed and the local concentration gradient. The appropriate kinetic study allows application of the stereodynamic technique for a rapid assessment of the blood coagulation activity.# Definition for a matrix.
