We report a 52-year-old woman who had a 10-year history of iron deficiency anemia, hypothyroidism, and celiac sprue who presented with symptomatic diarrhea and hypocalcemia. She was found to have high levels of antibodies to the T cell-dependent antigens, insulin, and tissue transglutaminase and had a markedly delayed T cell-dependent response to insulin-modified-segmented-leukocyte-interferon-gamma test for celiac sprue. Her symptoms disappeared on a gluten-free diet. An intestinal biopsy specimen obtained at colonoscopy showed crypt hyperplasia with expanded intraepithelial lymphocytes and early changes of celiac sprue. She did not have histologic evidence of malignancy. She showed no evidence of malabsorption of essential nutrients, and the hypocalcemia was thought to be attributable to her celiac sprue. Five months after her presentation, she had reflux symptoms requiring antireflux medication, which suggested a decrease in her thyroid function. She presented 5 years after her first presentation with diarrhea and hypoparathyroidism. Hypoparathyroidism was attributed to celiac sprue. C. difficile infection may have an autoimmune aetiology in some patients, and celiac sprue may be associated with atypical presentation or unusual coexisting infections.Q: ModelBuilding Tools I'd like to get some opinions about the different Maven/Gradle/PyMV/Mavener available tools that are used in the Java community. They are all three different tools from the same languages that are only different in the fact that they build everything "out of the box". In that sense, the final product is the same, but the process of the build is different (or, of course, the project configuration) I've already checked the link provided in the accepted answer of Is there a rule on naming for software projects with "software XYZ", and <https://d0c515b9f4>
